The Last Lecture is very interesting and provides a solid insight into Randy Pausch's life. Before watching the lecture, I knew absolutely nothing about Randy Pausch. After watching the lecture, I feel like I have a strong understanding of his life. While it was certainly long, the lecture never really felt like it dragged, and Pausch managed to keep it entertaining throughout. The aspect I found most fascinating was how well Pausch managed to maintain himself despite how "depressing" something like that speech could be. He is close to death, yet he manages to retell his life in front of a group of people in a way that's concise and comical. This approach is extremely admirable and adds a layer of authenticity to his points. He made the most of what he was given, and I think that's the point that connects with me the most. The most effective way to deal with inherent problems isn't to wallow in them. The only thing you can do is to acknowledge them and move past them. Certain things cannot be changed, and that's alright.
